1 Summary

This document shows how well a combination of laser altimetry and optical navigation acquired by the HAYABUSA spacecraft permits determining the approximate trajectory of the Hayabusa spacecraft relative to the asteroid Itokawa. We show here all the 1024 x 1024 AMICA images acquired during the Hayabusa's encounter with Itokawa that were employed to develop the most recent shape models of this asteroid. These data were also used to derive the trajectory of the spacecraft [R. W Gaskell et al., 2008]. The expected approximate location of the asteroid given this trajectory is shown in green with a white outline and is overlaid on the gray observed asteroid. The pointing solutions and orbits employed to outline these shape models on the HAYABUSA images provide the ancillary data that are part of the AMICA data delivered to the Planetary Data System. This file indicates that for most images present, the ancillary data is very good (within 1m or so of their actual location and pointing). The methodology here, which uses both the Laser Altimetry and Optical navigation data differs from the one that depends only on Laser Altimetry, which is the source of the laser altimetry derived spacecraft trajectory files delivered to the PDS for Hayabusa. The latter, while slightly less accurate, is better than the data presented here for when AMICA images are not collected, since none of the wide angle images could be sent to the ground during the encounter of HAYABUSA with Itokawa. The black diamond in each image indicates the location of the altimeters footprint on the surface of the asteroid.
